

BULL-E-TIN NO 6 – THE ROCKET IMPLOSION AT 86 FEET

Last Saturday during the second semi final, Bulls specialist catcher and Master Bull all rounder Ron "Rocket" Taylor had the misfortune of "pulling" something in his hind quarters or as we Bulls call it "rump"

An extraordinary chain of events occurred before, during and after the event as "The Bull-E-Tin" tries to explain.

The distance that Rocket actually got to by all accounts was 86 feet before succumbing to the stretcher, although it did happen earlier, approx 78 feet by all accounts but was still safe at first, protecting the average which means he actually achieved the 90 feet required. (see left for distance to first base)

Below you will see actual photographic evidence in a timeline frame as to the injury and events.

Batters Box
Calm and ready to hit and take off
- progress 0 feet

Batters Box, bat loaded, ready to swing and hit and run
- progress 0 feet

Hits the ball and takes off towards first at a rate of knots
- progress 4 feet

Running well at full speed and looking like a safe hit as he makes his way along the first base line
- progress 4 to 78 feet

Oh no, first implosion, attempts to launch support boosters
- progress 78 feet

Gets to first base somehow but turns to salad (rocket) Unable to stand
- progress 86 to 90 feet

Absolute devastation now, losing momentum as velocity and vertical drops to nil
- progress -90 feet

Carried from the field of battle in massive agony to be attended by highly trained professional medicos
- progress - - 90 feet

Dementure sets in with hallucinations as the injury takes hold, returns to boyhood
- progress - - 120 feet

Extreme hallucination as the injury worsens, becomes delirious and imagines all sorts of really weird stuff
- progress - - - 150 feet

With on going care however, it is expected he will make a full recovery
